

ANSWER

Indeed, social and economic inequalities in sports sector are responsible for its degradation in most of the developing countries. So, to introduce new infrastructure, allocation of funds is required. It would be highly beneficial for athletes to be international icons by acquainting new techniques.

Admittedly, disbursement of money to promote games also brings economic benefits to community. Fabrication of well designed playgrounds along with other amenities brings more viewership which in turn financially assists regime as well to individuals. For example, more than 3.5 million people saw the St. Louis Cardinals play at Busch Stadium in 2015, Baseball fans who attend games also pay for parking, eating , accommodation too. All that spending generates revenue and jobs for the local community. And, as those parking attendants, restaurant workers, and stadium workers spend their earnings, the money circulates again through the economy. Thus, expending on sports activities aggrandizes the economic status.

Apart from this, Financial assistance under sports promotional schemes is too advantageous for players. To achieve excellence at national and international level, sportsperson requires effective coaching which is expensive one ,in relevant sports discipline. As a result, they bring laurels to their motherland as well as get recognition in community which leads to bring enhancement in their income .Therefore, spending money on efficacious training assisted sportsperson to get monetary benefits by performing well in mega sports events.

To conclude, higher monetary resources must be granted to sports industry as it is profitable for society as well for individual which would also encourage players to play with enthusiasm.
