

ANSWER

Drawing a conclusion about an individual's characteristic by what one is wearing, is believed to be predictable. However, I disaccord with this ideology owing to appearances can be deceptive as well as a person is always more than the outlook portrayed.

The values that an individual carries within himself cannot be realized by just a glance on his outfit. Several times, people wearing sacred robes and religious symbols are doing so to deceive innocent followers. In some cases clothes can tell a lot about a person; however, one has to be careful to not stereotype people based on their clothing. A person's clothing can give you clues into the type of job they have for example, uniforms or business suits or what they do for various activities such as exercise clothing. People dress the way they do for numerous reasons. Judging people based on their clothing can lead to misinterpretation.

In particular, personal character of a person can be judged by the perception of how they respond to challenges. One can assume that someone who does a brave deed has outstanding personal character. Additionally, the social character relates to the attitudes and behavior a person has toward other people. Hence, more of the realities about a person can be known by talking to him or getting acquainted with his background. Therefore, the content of the ethics cannot be measured on the basis of the type of apparels, one is representing.

To recapitulate, dress sense embodies personal wealth and taste. Clothing of a person is never a full picture which can only be drawn by the knowledge, discipline and behavior, one follows in life. The way a human appears from outside just tells how he wants others to see him.